When we visited the volcano, it was in a state of eruption. We stood near the summit on an irregular plane; it was heaped up with stones and cinders and enormous rocks, which has been hurled from the volcano in terrible confusion. From this summit volumes of smoke and fountains of liquid fire poured forth continuously. The smoke, now white, now an impenetrable black, was accompanied by a deep roar. Fiery stone rained down, and molten lava move on with a horrible sound, devouring everything in it's path. We approach the lower end of these Lava rivers, where its speed was retarded by a reduced slope. It's dark exterior surface broke up as it moved, and betrayed the liquid fire beneath. By day light the fire was only just visible, but its presence was Indicated by the white smoke and the tremulous motion of the air above.
